

Tres Hombres

Vengeance from the West.

When you read the title of this piece, I bet you figured you'd be reading about saloons, gun-slingers, and mebbe something involving a lynching...

and a horse. Well, sorry all you fans of Louis L'Amore novels, this here story is in fact about the west, except the horses in this yarn are made of chrome and steel.

Picture three good friends sittin' around in a little saloon. As the rounds go by, the iron steed lovin' trio gets to talking about what each thought was the best way to build a custom bike. Since each had years of prior experience in the field what was put on the table, so to speak, was a viable plan to produce a great looking stable of factory customs that the masses could afford. Not that this hasn't been tried before, it's just that this trio felt they were tired of doing it someone else's way, and by the time the smoke cleared and all the notes scribbled on cocktail napkins were gathered up, a new company was in the works.
